F A B

F, A consonant generally reckoned by authors, and admitted by Scaliger, among the semi-vowels, and according to that opinion distinguished in the enumeration of the alphabet by a name beginning with a vowel, yet has so far the nature of a mute, that it is easily pronounced before a liquid in the same syllable. It has in English an invariable sound, formed by compression of the whole lips and a forcible breath. Its kindred letter is V, which, in the Islandick alphabet, is only distinguished from it by a point in the body of the letter.

Boasters are naturally falsifiers, and the people, of all others, that put their shame the worst together. L'Estrange's Fables.
To FALSIFY. v. a. [from false, French.]
1. To counterfeit; to forge; to produce something for that which in reality it is not.
We cannot excuse that church, which either through corrupt translations of Scripture, delivereth, instead of divine speeches, any thing repugnant unto that which God speaketh; or, through falsified additions, propoleth, that to the people of God as Scripture which is in truth no Scripture.
Hooker, b. v. f. 19.
The Irish bards use to forge and falsify every thing as they list, to please or displease any man. Spenser on Ireland.

2. To confute; to prove false.
Our Saviour's prophecy stands good in the destruction of the temple, and the dissolution of the Jewish economy, when Jews and Pagans united all their endeavours, under Julian the apostate, to baffle and falsify the prediction. Addison.
3. To violate; to break by falshood.
It shall be thy work, thy shameful work, which is in thy power to shun, to make him live to see thy faith falsified, and his bed defiled. Sidney, b. ii.
He suddenly falsified his faith, and villainously slew Selymes the king, as he was bathing himself, mistrusting nothing less than the falshood of the pyrate. Knolles's History of the Turks.
This superadds treachery to all the other pestilent ingredients of the crime; 'tis the falsifying the most important trust. Decay of Piety.
4. To pierce; to run through.
His crest is rasi'd away, his ample shield
Is falsify'd, and round with jav'lin fill'd. Dryden's Æn.
Of this word Mr. Dryden writes thus. My friends quarrelled at the word falsified, as an innovation in our language.
The fact is confessed; for I remember not to have read it in any English author; though perhaps it may be found in Spen- ser's Fairy Queen. But suppose it be not there: why am I forbidden to borrow from the Italian, a polished language, the word which is wanting in my native tongue? Horace has given us a rule for coining words, si græco fonte cadant, especially when other words are joined with them which explain the sense. I use the word falsify, in this place, to mean that the shield of Turnus was not of proof against the spears and javelins of the Trojans, which had pierced it through and through in many places. The words which accompany this new one, makes my meaning plain:
Ad si t'U lingo d'Anli era perfetto. Ariosto, cant. xxvi.
Coe mai poter fallario in nessun canto. Falser cannot otherwise be turned than by falsified; for his shield was falsified, is not English. I might indeed have contented myself with saying his shield was pierced, and bored, and stuck with javelins. Dryden.
Dryden, with all this effort, was not able to naturalise the new signification, which I have never seen copied, except once by some obscure nameless writer, and which indeed deserves not to be received.
To FALSIFY. v. n. To tell lies; to violate truth.
This point have we gained, that it is absolutely and universally unlawful to lie and falsify. South's Sermons.
FALSITY. n. f. [from false, Latin.]
1. Falseness; contrariety to truth.
Neither are they able to break through those errors, wherein they are so determinately settled, that they pay unto falsity the whole sum of whatever love is owing unto God's truth. Hooker, b. v. f. 49.
Can you on him such falsities obtrude?
And as a mortal the most wife delude: Sandys's Paraphrase.
Probability does not properly make any alteration, either in the truth or falsity of things; but only imports a different degree of their clearness or appearance to the understanding.
South's Sermons.
2. A lie; an error; a false assertion or position.
That Danubius ariseth from the Pyrenean hills, that the earth is higher towards the North, are opinions truly charged on Aristotle by the restorer of Epicurus, and all easily confutable falsities. Glarv. Scyth. c. 20.
To FALTER. v. n. [from falter, to be wanting, Spanish; vault- ur, a stammerer, Islandick, which is probably a word from the same radical.]
1. To hesitate in the utterance of words.
With faltering tongue, and trembling ev'ry vein,
Tell on, quoth she. Fairy Queen, b. i.
The pale assistants on each other star'd,
With gaping mouths for issuing words prepar'd;
The fill-born founts upon the palate hung,
And dy'd imperfect on the faltering tongue. Dryden.
He changes, gods! and looks declare him guilty.
His fears, his words, his looks declare him guilty. Smith.
2. To fail in any act of the body.
This earth shall have a feeling; and these stones Prove armed soldiers, ere her native king Shall falter under foul rebellious arms. Shaksp. Richard II.
How far do we are concerned in the want or weakness of any or all faculties, an exact observation of their several ways of faltering would discover. Locke.
To FALTER. v. a. To sit; to cleanse. This word seems to be merely rustic or provincial.
Barley for malt must be bold, dry, sweet, and clean faltered from foulness, seeds and oats. Mortimer's Husbandry.
FALTERINGLY. adv. [from falter.] With hesitation; with difficulty; with feebleness.
To FAMILIAR. v. a. [from familiar, Danish.] To hesitate in the speech. This word I find only in Shinner.

That the great body of our state may go
In equal rank with the best govern'd nation;
That war, or peace, or both at once, may be understood: there is nothing more familiar than this. Locke.

7. Easy; unconstrained.
He unreins
His muse, and sports in loose familiar strains. Addison.

A sister's likeness was in every face. Addison's Ovid's Met.

fecundity forty years; and I have found, from a friend, that melon-seeds, after thirty years, are best for raising of melons.
Ray on the Creation.
He could never create so ample a world, but he could have made a bigger; the fecundity of his creative power never grow-

FEE. n. f. [feoh, Saxon; fee, Danish, cattle; feudum, low Latin; feus, Scottish.]
1. [In law.] All lands and tenements that are held by any acknowledge of superiority to a higher lord. All lands and tenements, wherein a man hath a perpetual estate to him and his heirs, &c. are divided into allodium and feudum: allodium is every man's own land, which he possesses merely in his own right, without acknowledgment of any service, or payment of any rent to any other. Feudum, or fee, is that which we hold by the benefit of another, and in name whereof we owe services, or pay rent, or both, to a superior lord. And all our land in England, the crown-land, which is in the king's own hands, in right of his crown, excepted, is in the nature of feudum: for though a man have land by descent from his ancestors, or bought it for his money; yet is the land of such a nature, that it cannot come to any, either by descent or purchase, but with the burthen that was laid upon him who had novel fee, or first of all received it as a benefit from his lord, to him and to all such to whom it might descend, or be

- be any way conveyed from him. So that no man in England has directum dominium, that is, the very property or demefne in any land, but the prince in right of his crown: for though he that has fee has jus perpetuum & utile dominium, yet he owes a duty for it, and therefore it is not simply his own.
Fee is divided into two sorts; fee-absolute, otherwise called fee simple, and fee-conditional, otherwise termed fee-tail:
fee-simple is that whereof we are seized in those general words, To us and our heirs for ever: fee-tail is that whereof we are seized to us and our heirs, with limitation; that is, the heirs of our body, &c. And fee-tail is either general or special: general is where land is given to a man, and the heirs of his body: fee-tail special is that where a man and his wife are seized of land to them and the heirs of their two bodies. Covel.
Now like a lawyer, when he land would let,
Or felt fee-simples in his master's name. Hubbard's Tale.

Livings in courts be gotten, though full hard;
For nothing there is done without a fee. Hubbard's Tale.

But if I help, what do you promise me? Shakespeare.

tal soul; and though we be now miserable and feible, yet we aspire after eternal happiness, and finally expect a great exaltation of all our natural powers. Bentley's Sermons.
A crutch that helps the weak along,
Supports the feible, but retards the strong. Smith.
To FEIBLE. v. a. [from the noun.] To weaken; to enfeible; to deprive of strength or power. Not in use.

 Others may give the fewel or the fire;

2. A fibres, in physics, is an animal thread, of which there are different kinds: some are soft, flexible, and a little elastic; and these are either hollow, like small pipes, or spongy and full of little cells, as the nervous and fleshy fibres: others are more solid, flexible, and with a strong elasticity or spring, as the membranous and cartilaginous fibres; and a third sort are hard and flexible, as the fibres of the bones. Now of all these some are very sensible, and others destitute of all sense: some too very small as not to be easily perceived; and most of them, when examined with a microscope, appear to be composed of still smaller fibres: these fibres first constitute the substance of the bones, cartilages, ligaments, membranes, nerves, veins, arteries and muscles. And again, by the various texture and different combination of some or all of those parts, the more compound organs are framed; such as the lungs, stomach, liver, legs and arms, the sum of all which make up the body. Quincy.
- My heart sinks in me while I hear him speak,
 And every slacken'd *fib*re drops its hold,
 Like nature letting down the springs of life:
 The name of father awes me still. Dryd. Spanish Fryar.

 A well-grown oak, to root it from the ground;
 This way and that he wrench'd the fibrous bands,
 The trunk was like a sapling in his hands. Dryden.

hold.

The fingers and thumb in each hand consist of fifteen bones, there being three to each finger: they are a little convex and round towards the back of the hand, but hollow and plain towards the palm, except the last, where the nails are. The order of their dispositions is called first, second, and third phalanx: the first is longer than the second, and the second longer than the third. The upper extremity of the first bone on each finger has a little sinus, which receives the round head of the bones of the metacarpus. The upper extremity of the second and third bones of each finger hath two small sinuses, parted by a small protuberance; and the lower extremity of the first and second bones of each finger has two protuberances, divided by a small sinus: the two protuberances are received into the two sinuses of the upper extremity of the second and third bones; and the small sinus receives the little protube-rance of the same end of the same bones. The first bone of the thumb is like the bones of the metacarpus, and it is joined to the wrist and second of the thumb, as they are to the wrist like the first bones of the fingers, and it is joined to the first and third, as they are to the bones of the metacarpus and second of the fingers. The fingers are moved sideways only upon their first joint. Besides these there are some small bones, called ossa sesamoides, because they resemble sesamum grains; they are reckoned about twelve in each hand: they are placed at the joint of the fingers, under the tendons of the flexors, to which they serve as pulleys. Quincy.

Upon her skinny lips. Shakespeare's Macbeth.

lay hold of objects of any size or quantity. Ray on the Creat.

FLO-VER. n. f. [fleur, French; flor, flor, Latin.]

1. The part of a plant which contains the seeds.
Such are reckoned perfect flowers which have petals, a stamen, apex and stylus; and whatever flower wants either of these is reckoned imperfect. Perfect flowers are divided into simple ones, which are not composed of other smaller ones, and which usually have but one single style; and compound, which consist of many fociuli, all making but one flower. Simple flowers are monopetalous, which have the body of the flower all of one entire leaf, though sometimes cut or divided a little way into many feemingly petals, or leaves; as in borage, bugloss, &c. or polypetalous, which have distinct petals, and those falling off singly, and not all together, as the feemingly petals of monopetalous flowers always do: but those are further divided into uniform and difform flowers: the former have their right and left hand parts, and the forward and backward parts all alike; but the difform have no such regularity, as in the flowers of sage, deadnettle, &c. A monopetalous difform flower is likewise further divided into, first, semi-fistular, whose upper part resembles a pipe cut off obliquely, as in the arilochia: 2d, labiate; and this either with one lip only, as in the anacanthum and scordium, or with two lips, as in the far greater part of the labiate flowers: and here the upper lip is sometimes turned upwards, and so turns the convex part downwards, as in the chamæcisus, &c. but most commonly the upper lip is convex above, and turns the hollow part down to its fellow below, and so represents a kind of helmet, or monkhood; and from thence these are frequently called galeate, cucullate, and galeculatæ flowers; and in this form are the flowers of the lamium, and most verticillate plants. Sometimes also the lamium is intire, and sometimes jagged or divided. 3d, Coriaceous; that is, such hollow flowers as have on their upper part a kind of spur, or little horn, as in the linaria, delphinium, &c. and the carniculum, or calcar, is always impervious at the tip or point. Compound flowers are either, first, discous or discoidal; that is, whose fociuli are set together so close, thick, and even, as to make the surface of the flower plain and flat, which therefore, because of its round form, will be like a discus; which disk is sometimes radiated, when there is a row of petals standing round in the disk, like the points of a star, as in the matricaria, chamæmelum, &c. and sometimes naked, having no such radiating leaves round the limb of its disk, as in the tanacetum: 2d, planifolious, which is composed of plain flowers, set together in circular rows round the centre, and whose face is usually indented, notched uneven and jagged, as the hieracia, &c. 3d, fistular, which is compounded of many long hollow little flowers, like pipes, all divided into large jags at the ends. Imperfect flowers, because they want the petals, are called staminate, apetalous, and capillaceous; and those which hang pendulous by fine threads, like the juli, are by Tournefort called amentaceous, and we call them cat-tail. The term campaniformis is used for such as are in the shape of a bell, and infundibuliformis for such as are in the form of a funnel. Miller.

Dying ere they sicken. Shakespeare's Macbeth.

shewn us this way to improvement. Watts's Improvement.
If a thinned or plated body, which, being of an even thickness, appears all over of one uniform colour, should be slit with the plate, I see no reason why every thread or fragment should not keep its colour. Newton's Opt.

FRA'GMENTARY. adj. [from fragment.] Composed of frag- ments. A word not elegant, nor in use.

He knows it too too much that thinks it nought. Dome.

ficial heats. Addison's Spectator, No. 47.
Not lovelier seem'd Narcissus to the eye;
Nor, when a flower, could boast more fragrancy. Garth.

happiness, we find, at last, that the materials of the structure are frail and perishing, and the foundation itself is laid in the sand. Rogers, Sermon 5.

Here all its frailties, all its flames resign,
And wait, 'till 'tis no sin to mix with thine. Pope.
FRA'ISCHEUR. n. f. [French.] Freshness; coolness. A

Frankincense is a dry resinous substance in pieces or drops, of a pale yellowish white colour; a strong smell, but not disagreeable, and a bitter, acrid, and resinous taste. It is very inflammable. The earliest histories inform us, that frankincense was used among the sacred rites and sacrifices, as it still continues to be in many different parts of the world. As well however as the world has at all times been acquainted with the drug itself, we are still uncertain as to the place whence frankincense is brought, and much more so as to the tree which produces it. It is commended against disorders in the head and breast, and against diarrhoeas and dysenteries. Hill.
Take unto thee sweet spices, with pure frankincense. Exod.

tempt; and declared, with a very unnecessary frankness, that he would have no friendship with him. Clarendon.
Tom made love to a woman of sense, and always treated her as such during the whole time of courtship: his natural him converse with her before marriage in the same manner he intended to do afterwards. Addison's Guardian.

2. Liberality; bountyfousness.

word, what Kalander had told him touching the strange story. Stany.

and frankness of dealing, and a name of certainty and ve-

FRA

- FRANKPLEDGE. n. f. [francplegium, Latin, of frane, i. e.
litter & plice, i. e. filet insur.] A pledge or surety for freemen. For the ancient custom of England, for the preservation of the public peace, was that every freeborn man at fourteen years of age, religious persons, clerks, knights and their eldest sons excepted, should find security for his fidelity to the king, or else be kept in prison: whence it became customary for a certain number of neighbours to be bound for one another, to see each man of their pledge forthcoming at all times, or to answer the transgression of any one absenting himself. This was called frankpledge, and the circuit thereof was called decenna, because it commonly consisted of ten households; and every particular person, thus mutually bound, was called decennier. This custom was so strictly observed, that the sheriffs, in every county, did from time to time take the oaths of young ones as they grew to the age of fourteen years, and see that they combined in one dozen or other: whereupon this branch of the sheriff's authority was called visus francplegiis, view of frankpledge. Cowel.

fee, fee-tail, or for life. Freehold in law is the right that a man has to such land or tenements before his entry or seizure. Freehold is sometimes taken in opposition to villenage. Land, in the time of the Saxons, was called either bockland, that is, holden by book or writing, or folcland, that is, holden without writing. The former was held by far better conditions; and by the better sort of tenants, as noblemen and gentlemen, being such as we now call freehold. The latter was commonly in the possession of clowns, being that which we now call at the will of the lord. Cowel.

Nerva one night supped privately with some six or seven; amongst whom there was one that was a dangerous man, and began to take the like courses as Marcellus and Regulus had done: the emperor fell into discourse of the injustice and tyranny of the former time, and, by name, of the two accusers; and said, what should we do with them, if we had them now? Of what use is freedom of thought, if it will not produce freedom of action, which is the sole end, how remote soever in appearance, of all objections against Christianity? And therefore the freethinkers consider it as an edifice, wherein all the parts have such a mutual dependance on each other, that if you pull out one single nail, the whole fabric must fall to the ground. Swift's Argument against abolishing Christianity.

I need not instance in the habitual intemperance of rich tables, nor the evil accidents and effects of fulness, pride and lusty wantonness and softness. Taylor's Rule of living holy.
7. Plenty; wealth.
To lapse in fulness
Is forer than to lie for need; and falsehood
Is worse in kings than beggars. Shakespeare's Cymbeline.

A principal fruit of friendship is the ease and discharge of the fulness of the heart, which passions of all kinds do cause an anomalous figure, somewhat resembling a papilionaceous flower, consisting of two petals or leaves, open like two lips, the upper lip ending in a spur: the footstalk is joined to the middle part of the flower: the fruit is either of a long or a round figure, which is like a pod. Miller.

The darnel, hemlock, and rank fumatory, Doth root upon. Shakespeare's Henry V.

in tobacco, of other things, to dry and comfort. Bacon.
In Winter, when the heat without is less, it becomes so far quantity. Woodward's Natural History.

3. Exhalation from the stomach.
The fumes of drink discompose and stupify the brains of a

That memory, the warder of the brain,
Shall be a fume. Shakespeare's Macbeth.
6. Idle conceit; vain imagination.
Plato's great year would have some effect, not in renewing

Bacon, Essay 50.

Their parts are kept from fuming away by their fixity, and

Their ills all built on life, that fundamental ill. Prior.

GAD

G Has two sounds, one from the Greek Γ, and the Latin, which is called that of the hard G, because it is formed by a pressure somewhat hard of the forepart of the tongue against the upper gum. This sound G retains before a, e, u, l, r; as, gate, go, gull.
The other sound, called that of the soft G, resembles that of γ, and is commonly, though not always, found before e, i; as, gem, gibbet. Before n, at the end of a word, g is commonly melted away; as in the French, from which these words are commonly derived: thus, for benign, malign, condign, we pronounce benine, maline, condine. It is often silent in the middle of words before b; as, might. The Saxon G, seems to have had generally the sound of y consonant; whence gate is by rusticks still pronounced yate.
GABARDINE. n. f. [gavardina, Italian.] A coarse frock; any mean dress.
My best way is to creep under his gabardine; there is no other shelter hereabout. Shakspeare's Tempest.

With their hoarse gabbles seek the silent shoar. Dryden.
2. To prate loudly without meaning.

GAB. n. f. [gab, Saxon; gaddur, Islandick, a club.]
1. A wedge or ingot of steel.

more in length, and an inch in thickness: its colour is brown, with a faint cast of red in it: it has a disagreeable, but much less acrid and pungent taste than the smaller sort. They are both brought from the East-Indies; the small kind from China, and the larger from the island of Java, wherewith the people,

- as a resin, and soluble in water as a gum, and will not dissolve in oil as pure resins do. It is the produce of an umbelliferous plant, whose stalks are about an inch thick, and five or six feet high: its leaves are like the common anise, of a strong smell, and acrid taste; but the flowers, and especially the seeds, much more so. The whole plant abounds with a viscous milky juice, which it yields when wounded, and which soon concretes into substance called galbanum. The plant is frequent in Persia, and in many parts of Africa. Its medicinal virtues are considerable in asthma, coughs, and hysterick com-tires of guns at the head, and at the stern there are two tires

Is fancy's spring, but sorrow's fall. Shaksp. Lear.
It drew from my heart all love,
And added to the gall. Shaksp. King Lear.
This position informs us of a vulgar error, terming the gall bitter, as their proverb more peremptorily implies. It is as bitter as gall; whereas there's nothing galler sweeter, and what is most viscous must needs partake of a sweet favour.
Harvey on Consumptions.
Gall is the greatest resolvent of curdled milk: Boerhaave has given at a time one drop of the gall of an eel with

GAL

7. [From galla.]

Galls or gálnuts are a kind of preternatural and accidental tumours, produced on various trees; but those of the oak only are used in medicine. We have two kinds, the Oriental and the European galls: the Oriental are brought from Aleppo, of the bigness of a large nutmeg, with tubercles on their surface, of a very firm and solid texture, and a disagreeable, acerb, and astringent taste. The European galls are of the same size, with perfectly smooth surfaces: they are light, often spongy, and cavernous within, and always of a lax texture. They have a less austere taste, and are of much less value than the first, both in manufactures and medicine. The general history of galls is this: an insect of the fly kind, for the safety of her young, wounds the branches of the tree, and in the hole deposits her egg: the lacerated vessels of the tree discharging their contents, form a tumour or woody case about the hole, where the egg is thus defended from all injuries. This tumour also serves for the food of the tender maggot, produced from the egg of the fly, which, as soon as it is perfect, and in its winged state, gnaws its way out, as appears from the hole found in the gall; and where no hole is seen on its surface, the maggot, or its remains, are sure to be found within, on breaking it. It has been observed, that the oak does not produce galls in cold countries: but this observation should be confined to the medicinal galls; for all those excrescences which we find on this tree in our own woods, and call oak-apples, oak-grapes, and oak-cones, are true and genuine galls, though less firm in their texture. The true reason of the hard ones not being produced with us, seems to be that we want the peculiar species of insect to which they owe their origin, which is a fly of the ichneumon kind, only found in hot countries. The species of fly that occasions, by its punctures, the soft galls of France and Italy, is different both from the Syrian one and from ours, though still of the ichneumon kind; and we find the several kinds, which occasion the different galls in our own kingdom, produce different kinds, and those of different degrees of hardness, on the same tree. Galls are used in making ink, and in dying and dressing leather, and many other manufactures. In medicine they are very astringent, and good under proper management. Hill. Besides the acorns, the oak beareth galls, oak-apples, and oak-nuts. Bacon's Natural History, N<sup>o</sup>. 635.

Malpighi, in his treatise of galls, under which name he comprehends all preternatural and morbose excrescences, demonstrates that all such excrescences, where any insects are found, are excited by some venenose liquor, which, together with their eggs, such insects shed. Roy on the Creation. The Aleppo galls, wherewith we make ink, are no other than cases of insects, which are bred in them. Derham.

stalk, rises from the centre of the empalement, and afterward becomes a globular fleshy fruit; in the centre of which are included many seeds, which are shaped almost like kidneys. This tree is pretty common in Jamaica, and several other places in the warmer parts of America, where it usually rises to the height of thirty or forty feet, and spreads into many branches. When the flowers fall off the pointal, it becomes a round fruit about the size of a tennis-ball, which, when ripe, has a rough brownish rind, and a mealy sweet pulp, somewhat like some of the European pears; but has a strong scent of garlick.

Hence, rotten things, or I shall shake thy bones
Out of thy garments.

Our leaf, once fallen, springeth no more; neither doth the and flowers.

Three worthy persons from his side it tore, colours that appear in the garments of a British lady, when she is dressed.

GARNET n. f. [garnato, Italian; granatus, low Latin, from its various sizes. Its surfaces are not so smooth or polite as those of a ruby, and its colour is ever of a strong red, with a plain admixture of blueish: its degree of colour is very different, and it always wants much of the brightness of the ruby.

The garnet seems to be a species of the carbuncle of the ancients: the Bohemian is red, with a slight cast of a flamecolour; and the Syrian is red, with a slight cast of purple.

2. To embellish a dish with something laid round it.

so that the race of garraun would decrease.

He reed, he grow'd, and at the altar fell.

Hamilton drove Newton almost to the end of the lists; but Newton on a sudden gave him such a gash on the leg, that

3. To long for. This sense is, I think, not proper, as nature never expresses desire by gasping.
The Castilian and his wife had the comfort to be under the same master, who, seeing how dearly they loved one another, and gashed after their liberty, demanded a most exorbitant price for their ransom.

GASP n. f. [from the verb.]

GAUDE, n. f. [The etymology of this word is uncertain:
Skinner imagines it may come from gaude, French, a yellow to his custom, talks of grye; and Mr. Lye finds gaude, in Douglas, to signify deceit or fraud, from gaudius, Welsh, to cheat. It seems to me most easily deducible from gandium, Latin, joy; the cause of joy; a token of joy: thence aptly applied to any thing that gives or expresses pleasure. In Scotland this word is still retained, both as a thowly bawble, and artful manner in Homer's battles of taking measure or gaging his heroes by each other, and thereby elevating the character

Geometry very probably had its first rise in Egypt, where the Nile annually overflowing the country, and covering it with mud, obliged men to distinguish their lands one from another, by the consideration of their figure; and after which, 'tis probable, to be able also to measure the quantity of it, and to know how to plot it, and lay it out again in its just dimensions, figure and proportion: after which, it is likely, a farther contemplation of those draughts and figures helped them to discover many excellent and wonderful properties belonging to them; which speculations were continually improving, and are still to this day. Geometry is usually divided into speculative and practical; the former of which contemplates and treats of the properties of continued quantity abstractedly; and the latter applies these speculations and theorems to use and practice, and to the benefit and advantage of mankind. Harris.

GLASSWORK.

GLE

GLASSWORT. n. f. [salicornia, or saltwort.]

It hath an apetalous flower, wanting the empalement; for the stamina, or chives, and the embryos grow on the extreme part of the leaves: these embryos afterward become pods or bladders, which for the most part contain one seed. The species are two. These plants grow on the sea-coasts in many parts of Europe, and upon the shores in several places of England which are washed every tide with the salt water. The inhabitants, near the sea-coast where these plants grow, cut them up toward the latter end of Summer, when they are fully grown; and, after having dried them in the sun, they burn them for their ashes, which are used in making of glass and soap. These herbs are by the country people called kelp, and are promiseously gathered for use. From the ashes of these plants is extracted the salt called sal kali, or alkali, much used by the chymists.

For the fine glass we use the purest of the finest sand, and the ashes of chali or glasswort; and for the coarser or green sort, the ashes of brake or other plants. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

The clouds that press my soul. Prior.

GLUTINOUS. adj. [glutinosus, French, from gluten, Latin.] Gluey; viscous; tenacious.
The cause of all vivification is a gentle and proportionable heat, working upon a glutinous and yielding substance; for the heat doth bring forth spirit in that substance, and the substance being glutinous, produceth two effects: the one, that the spirit is detained, and cannot break forth; the other, that the mater, being gentle and yielding, is driven forwards by the motion of the spirits, after some swelling, into shape and members.

1. Gold is the heaviest, the most dense, the most simple, the most ductile, and most fixed of all bodies; not to be injured either by air or fire, and seeming incorruptible. It is soluble by means of sea-salt; but is injured by no other salt, and is most easily of all metals amalgamated with silver. Gold is frequently found native, and very rarely in a state of ore. It never constitutes a peculiar ore, but is found most frequently among ore of silver. Native gold is seldom found pure, but has almost constantly silver with it, and very frequently copper. Gold dust, or native gold, in small masses, is mixed among the sand of rivers in many parts of the world. It is found, in the greatest abundance, bedded in masses of hard stone, often at the depth of a hundred and fifty fathoms in the mines of Peru. Pure gold is so fixed, that Boerhaave informs us of an ounce of it set in the eye of a glass furnace for two months, without losing a single grain. Hill on Fossils.

the body next in hardness to a bone.
No living creatures, that have shells very hard, as oysters, crabs, lobsters, and especially the tortoise, have no bones within them, but only little gristles. Bacon's Nat. History.
Left the asperity or hardness of these cartilages should hurt the oesophagus or gullet, which is tender and of a skinny substance, or hinder the swallowing of our meat, therefore these annular gristles are not made round, or intire circles; but where the gullet touches the windpipe, there, to fill up the circle, is only a soft membrane, which may easily give way to the dilatation of the gullet. Ray on the Creation.
GRISTLY. adj. [from gristle.] Cartilaginous; made of gristle.

Will rise luxuriant, and with toughest root Pierce the obdurate grit and resistive marle. Phillips.
4. Grits are fossils found in minute masses, forming together a kind of powder; the several particles of which are of no de-terminate shape, but seem the rudely broken fragments of larger masses; not to be dissolved or diffused by water, but retaining their figure, and not cohering into a mass. They are opaque, and in many species fermenting with acids, and often fouled with heterogeneous matters. One sort is a fine, dull looking, grey grit, which, if wetted with salt-water into mortar or paste, dries almost immediately, and coalesces into a hard stony mass, such as is not easily afterwards diffused by water. This is the pulvis puteolans of the ancients, mixed among their cements used in buildings sunk into the sea; and in France and Italy an ingredient in their harder plasters, under the name of pozzolana. It is common on the sides of hills in Italy. Another species, which is a coarse, beautifully green, dull grit, is the chrysolilla of the ancients, which they used in folding gold, long supposed a lost fossil. It serves the purpose of folding metals better than borax, and may be

HAB

H is in English, as in other languages, a note of aspiration, founded only by a strong emission of the breath, without any conformation of the organs of speech, and is therefore by many grammarians accounted no letter. The h in English is scarcely ever mute at the beginning of a word, or where it immediately precedes a vowel; as house, behaviour: where it is followed by a consonant it has no sound, according to the present pronunciation: but anciently, as now in Scotland, it made the syllable guttural; as right, bought.
